Discipline Is Discussed By P.T.A Council

The Appomattox County Council of P.T.A.'s met last Tuesday evening at the Appomattox County Intermediate School.

Supt. Earl Smith, principals of the four county schools, P.T-A officers and delegates from the four county schools were present. The meeting was called to order by president Deryl Holliday. The following goals were set for 1972-73.

(1) To encourage more parents to follow their studets ents to follow their students throughout their public school career with interest and concern.

(2) Where needed, better communications between the school and home.

(3) Investigate the possibility of hosting the annual District P.T.A. meeting at the Intermediate School next April.

(4) To encourage the four P. T.A.'s to develop and bring about more interest in their own local units.

Each P.T.A. will be asked to consider these goals for possible action.

Following the business session, a conference was held concerning discipline within each school. Each principal gave his philosophy.

The purpose for this program was to give information, have a time of sharing and give opportunity for questions about discipline in the schools.

From this time of sharing it was learned that good discipline is maintained within the school when students know what is expected of them. It is a teacher's responsibility to maintain discipline with his pupils. Successful experiences by the students, good atmosphere to make learning easier, parents' interest in the child's work, parent-teacher conferences, parents taking their responsibilities in teaching the child acceptable behavior, treating the cause rather than the symptoms, the importance of self-discipline and many other ideas were given.

Research has shown where parents and teachers work together, there are fewer problems of discipline. Where persons make efforts to try to get along regardless of individual differences, discipline is successful.

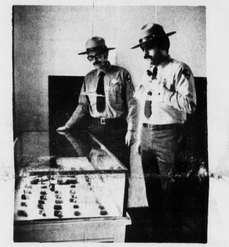
A Pamplin Industry For Years

Pipes Go On Display At Park

Pamplin Pipe Factory, Pamplin, Virginia -- for years a leading manufacturer of red clay pipes shipped all over the U.S. The old brick kiln can be seen at the left just behind the factory extension. The factory produced pipes until the late 1940's. Pamplin pipes are fast becoming a valuable collector's item.



National Park historian Ken Apschnikat (right) and interpretive guide Duane Schrock (left) look over the display of Pamplin pipes, molds from which some of them were made plus a good sized portion of the Appomattox county red clay from which pipes were made. The display is a special feature of the 100th Commemoration of the founding of the National Park system. The kitchen area of Clover Hill Tavern at the National Park is the location for 100th anniversary displays.

(Editor's Note: A display of Pamplin pipes is a featured exhibit at Appomattox Court House National Historical Park. Park historian Ken Apschnikat has prepared a short history of the pipes, part of which is published here.)

For thousands of years man has gained pleasure and relaxation from smoking tobacco in pipes. Various materials and methods have been used over the years for making pipes, but clay has been the favorite. In central Virginia or the Piedmont area clay is of a fine quality for making pipes. Its richness in iron oxide gives it a dark red color, and its consistency makes it ideal. Particularly around Pamplin City in Southeast Appomattox County the clay is responsible for the interesting home and manufacturing industry of making red clay pipes.

Legends say the white men who first settled this area of Virginia learned this technique of pipe making from Indians who lived around the Pamplin area. Pipes were all home-made and made only for home use until 1739 when the Pamplin Smoking Pipe and Manufacturing Company, Inc. (hereafter P.S.P. & Mfg. Co., Inc.) was supposedly established in Pamplin City, according to a letterhead. No exact date has been determined as to when the home-made pipes began to be made, but folks in the area say for over 200 years. Regardless, manual clay pipemaking is one of America's oldest industries.

Low income white women and Negro slaves made them for more than 50 years prior to the Civil War. A local legend says Negro slaves learned the art from an aged white man who was considered a hermit and supported himself by pipemaking. Even before the Civil War slaves of a rich old bachelor were allowed to make a living making and selling pipes. During the Civil War, pipemaking was an important source of income and survival for lower income white women.

In early years red clay pipes were either bartered or sold to local general stores. These stores would in turn sell them at a small profit, or sell them wholesale to other general stores in Piedmont Virginia. After the establishment of the P.S.P. & Mfg. Co., Inc. the local makers of these red clay pipes sold them to the company who then shipped them all over the country to catalog customers or wholesalers. Many were still sold by locals directly to general stores.
